THE SHOE BRUSH GONE

I don't know it, but I have long since adopted an easier and cheaper way. A bottle of Warr's ACME shoe polish and a sponge to keep my shoes washed clean, sure is a lot of labor and shoe polish. And it does them better. Try it. The best shoe polish in the world. WARR & BARNES, HUNTSVILLE.

DOWN IN THE DELL.

"I will bring you a lovely cluster of wild roses, papa."

"Very well, Fannie; don't hurry back, for I think you linger too constantly beside my chair, and I want you to take a long ramble. I will read, dear."

And Andrew Mahr drew one of the papers that lay on a table near him of his knee, and unfolded it. Fannie bent and kissed his worn, tender face; and then, with the soft refrain of an old song on her lips, ran lightly down the path, and left him there in the shadow of the great tree before his door, with that ever-growing wistfulness in his eyes as they followed her, and that terrible, gnawing pain in his heart of which she was the centre.

"My only one—my son's twin!" he murmured; "and have guided and guarded her for sixteen years, kept her like free of shadow or trial. And now—now when I know that my days are numbered, I can find in this whole wide world no single heart on which she can lean in that dreadful hour when she knows that I am no longer with her. If I might leave her wealth—gold will buy kindness; but she will be alone, poor, helpless—my tenderly cherished child!"

The thought that came so often and shook him so terribly stopped his murmured words, and when he drew down the handkerchief of which he had tied to his lips, it was stained with blood.

"My child!" he murmured—any child! and she does not know my danger. How can I tell her?"

For she did not know that a shadow dark and dismal was upon him. He was weak, but that was all she knew. When the summer was over and autumn came, he had told her that he would be well and strong once more, and she believed him.

When two are all to all to each other, and there are none to either, per the warning, one of them never dreams of an hour when he or she will live in a world which shall know the other no more forever.

And so it was with the motherless girl who filled her soft song as she went through the autumn. She had but her father in all the vastness of the earth, and she did not dream that he was dying, as she was true, in the road of which some possible has led herself to draw the steady line, unseen.

She went through the small garden of the Mahr—for they were poor and their acres scanty—and out at a little gate and along the quiet country roadway. It was such a well-wooded spot in which Albert Mahr had taken his much-esteemed in that fierce tempest of grief which had swept over his soul as the clouds fell on his dead wife's coffin.

There was no need for her to keep the forest hot over her weary heart—out of one eye would see as she hung it on her arm and slipped lightly onward, stepping now and then to gather a white rose, a lily, and fresh and sweet as any of the best forest flowers that prosperity had led her hands.

She had the road at last and penetrated into a green dell beside it, where ferns grew thick and green, and she took some flowers. "I will take some home," she said aloud, "papa will like them."

And she bent over some larkspur flowers, when a low moan made her start, and she looked down at her feet. "It seemed like a smothered cry of pain," she whispered. "What shall I do?"

But as the moan repeated her again, this time sounding very clearly, the warm young heart in her bosom answered her question and sent her forward toward the sound.

Down in the deep, green heart of the dell she saw a man's form lying prostrate among a few loose stones and broken branches; and fearing nothing but losing all her soft, sweet bloom in sudden pity, she hastened to the side of the fallen man.

"What is it?" she asked, falteringly. "You are in pain, are you not?"

But there was no answer; the man's head ceased. She bent lower, then, and knelt and turned the face, until now hidden from her sight.

It was clear cut, handsome young—a face which she had seen many a time and oft fit by her simple home in the early morning or the twilight hours—the face of one who was looked up to for his wealth and position, his pride and his nobility. But as she looked on it now she saw only a blue line of pain about the well-cut lips, and a white, senseless rigidity upon the whole handsome face.

"What shall I do?" she cried out, trembling so that the head slid from her hold and lay once more on the earth.

She looked about her. Yes, there was a small stream near, she ran to it, dipped in her handkerchief, and hastening back, bathed the white, set face.

Then a fear stole over her that he was dead—dead! and actual terror made her gray eyes fill with tears and sobs burst from her.

"Oh, please speak to me!" she cried impudently—"try to speak! I am so—so frightened."

And suddenly the color rushed into the face before her, the lips flew up, and a pair of bonnie brown eyes met hers.

Would she ever forget the sense of relief, of joy, of gladness, that came as she knelt there and saw life flash back into Glynn Herno's face! Would he ever forget the strange sweetness he found in those fearful, gray eyes, on those tremulous, red lips, in the soft, shy, friendly face that colored as he looked upon it?

"Have I alarmed you?" he asked, lifting himself on his elbow, as she drew away. "I had a fall here, and my ankle is sprained. That is all, I think, but the pain was terrible. I felt myself growing faint with it, and so I did."

"Yes," she said, trying to check her going; "I heard you, and when I reached here I thought you dead."

She divined as she said the last word, and he smiled a little.

"Poor child!" he said, gently; "you are terribly shaken, and I am so sorry to have been the cause of it. Now, what is to be done with me? I cannot walk, for it was the accident to stand that gave me such agony."

He moved and made a wry face as he moved the injured foot.

He had remembered the best medicine Fannie's arrival, and she could see that the foot was swelling rapidly.

"If you would let me help you," she said, shyly, "perhaps you could get to my home and papa would know what to do for you. It is not only beyond sight there."

"Perhaps," he said, definitely, looking at the slight figure, with the gleam of a smile in his eyes. "I will try not to let your strength too greatly; but if I might lean a little on your shoulder—my foot is perfectly useless, and the ankle burns like fire."

So, after a few moments of hesitation and many a keen pang to Glynn Herno, which he bore in silence, but with whitening lips, the two reached Fannie's home, and considerably startled Mr. Mahr, who saw them advance haltingly toward him.

In half an hour the young man—until then a stranger to them, but to be a stranger no more forever to Albert Mahr and his fair daughter—was lying comfortably on a sofa in the tiny parlor, his foot swathed in his dress, which Fannie kept moist and cool, awaiting the carriage which had been sent for but half wishing that he might remain where he was, ministered to by those small, white hands—looked on so sympathetically by those tender eyes—and spoken to so kindly by that gentle old man, whose face was so warm and shadowy in the fading day that it made his heart ache to look upon it.

Perhaps it was the shadow that touched her unconscious brow—the terrible pain and loss which he so clearly foresaw for her, and which he saw she neither dreamed of nor feared—that first awakened a tenderness for her in Glynn Herno's breast.

Be it as it may, when he was borne toward his home, the memory of a girl's sweet face went with him and made him half-unconscious of his pain.

And during the week that followed, while he was unable to use his foot in any way, that sweet face seemed to hover near him always, and the longing to see it again grew with every passing hour.

When at last he could wear a slinger, he allowed his longing to send him to her pretty, simple home; and he found such a charm there that he went again and again day after day, even after his ankle had grown strong and well.

And Mr. Mahr, praying daily for a friend for his child in the time when she would so sorely need one, did not perceive the fact that God, in sending Glynn Herno, had sent her all for which his tender lips supplanted, until the evening in the gloaming, when the two were out alone in the little parlor, and Glynn told him of the love which had grown in his heart for Fannie and asked him for permission to woo her for his wife.

The old man bowed his white head, and a thanksgiving to heaven lay softly on his lips; then he put out his hand and clasped Glynn's weakly but warmly.

"Good bless you!" he said with a falter in his voice. "I am going from here, and it was so hard to leave her all alone! Now—now I shall not fear for her future, for you are all a man should be, and she cares for you, I know. Win her whole heart, make her love you as her mother loved me in my youth, and I shall close my eyes knowing that she will sorrow for me (indeed, but be firmly sustained with her hand in yours, your love about her."

And so it was. She was a happy wife when the shaft of sorrow struck her, and Glynn's heart was her shield against it.

June—[I said] "Nimble" yesterday. He is doing first rate and has a new watch and chain."

Brown—"He must have gotten down to steady work."

"Yes," he has. He's in the post-dentary."

His Life for His Brothers.

The following story is preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford: The tower door of St. Leonard's Church, Bridgworth, England, was left open, and two young boys wandering in, were tempted to mount up into the upper part and scramble from beam to beam.

All at once a joint gave way. The beam on which they were standing became displaced. The elder had just time to grasp it when falling, while the younger, slipping over his body, caught hold of his comrade's legs.

In this fearful position the poor little hung, crying vainly for help for an hour or more. At length the boy clinging to the beam became exhausted. He could no longer support the double weight. He called out to the lad below that they were both done for.

"Could you save yourself if I were to loose you?" replied the lit, little lad.

"I think I could," rejoined the older.

"Then good-by, and God bless you!" cried the little fellow, losing his hold.

Another second and he was dashed to pieces on the stone floor below, his companion clambering to a place of safety.

He Set a Loan.

The other evening a citizen who stood at the corner of Woodward and Jefferson avenues was asked by a stranger for a nickel to pay car fare up Michigan avenue.

"You look able to walk," was the reply.

"So I am; but I'm in a great hurry."

"It strikes me as pretty cheeky for a tramp to beg money to ride on when his legs are all right."

"My dear man this is an exceptional case. I was up that avenue to day and met a citizen who piled my broken condition. He didn't have any trouble with him just then but promised to give me fifty cents if I would meet him at the corner of Fifth and street at 9 o'clock."

It is now 8:30. I can't make it on foot. If I don't get a nickel I am gone up for that half. Please look at the case with a business eye and favor me with the loan."

He was favored and he got on the front end of the car, so as to get there seventeen feet ahead of the rear platform.

Mrs. Chitchat (caller)—"Why, my dear Mrs. Starvon what is the matter? You look distressed."

Mrs. Starvon (boastful housewife)—"Oh, the wicked thing has happened! You remember Mr. Griggs, who used to board here at $5 a week, and was such a comfort to me?"

Mrs. C.—"Yes. You said he had scarcely any teeth left, and could barely eat a thing. Didn't cost any more to keep than a kitten."

Mrs. S.—"That's the one. Oh, he's a villain! He came back yesterday, and I let him have board at only $5 a week, and now I find he's got a new set of false teeth, and eats like a hog."

Superintendent of an Electric Railway, in opposition for a position.—"What is your name?"

Applicant—"Wood, sir."

"You want to be appointed conductor?"

"Yes, sir."

"Can't take you, sir."

"Why not?"

"Electric experts say that Wood is a poor conductor."

The Agency and American Railroad are experimenting with the Kewanee invention. This consists of the track and two being connected with dirt, only the top of the rail being exposed. The spikes are not driven down, light, but give the rail the rigidity of an iron pipe. This allows the rail to cross over itself in front of the train, giving a smooth riding road. The experiment was a success.

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11.—President Harrison has not passed a pleasant week, politically speaking. First Assistant Postmaster General Chubbuck returned from a pilgrimage he made to Mahone's home, at President Harrison's suggestion, and brought back bad news. That was a terrible disappointment to Mahone had made the President believe that he was certain to carry Virginia. Then came the news that Indianapolis his old home, had gone democratic, and to add to the discomfort caused by this news, several private telegrams gave the information that the Ex Union soldiers were responsible for it, and that they intended to use a strike for the removal of T. W. or. The same news has created a stampede among the Ohio republicans here. They recognize the fact that if anything like the same anti-Unionism is shown in the soldier vote in that state as was exhibited at Indianapolis their chances of carrying the state are gone glimmering into the distance might have been.

The only member of the administration that is not disappointed at Mahone's winning prospects in Virginia is Mr. Mahone. He has never liked Mahone, and has never taken any trouble to conceal the dislike. Much excitement was created among democrats here early in the week by the publication of a telegram stating that Hon. Samuel J. Randall would soon again be able to occupy his seat in the House. Later news showed it. A telegram direct from Mr. Randall stated that his health was much better than for several years, and that he would be in Washington in the course of a few weeks prepared to take an active part in the proceedings of the House. Samuel J. Randall's valuable services will be constantly needed by the minority this winter.

Some conversation has been caused here by the fact that ex-Senator Kellogg went all the way to Chicago to live a household with Harrison's manner of distributing the officers in the South, through the medium of a newspaper interview. Kellogg got very badly left, and the grapes are consequently very, very sour.

The Knights Templar and their friends in attendance upon the twenty-fourth annual convocation at the order here had coffee possession of Washington this week. They have paraded 25,000 strong here been arrested, and received at a special reception by the President; have been wound, dined, and fêted by hospitable Washingtonians; have made pilgrimages to and held special services at the graves of their deceased leaders, G. Washington, John, and have to a man, and in a woman too, expressed themselves in favor of Washington as the place for holding the World's Exposition in 1893.

S. G. Brock, of Missouri, who was defeated in the last Congressional election of that state at the last election by Representative Hatch, has been appointed chief of the bureau of statistics of the Treasury department.

The other session adjourned over the appointment of Edward G. Lusk, of the District of Columbia, to be Director of the Mint. They expect that the new effort will be successful for the use of the Government to purchase and coin the full amount of silver bullion authorized by law—$4,000,000 per month. A custom thing about his address, which were principally from the Pacific coast, was that both New York democracy even saying them. He has been connected with the mint bureau since its organization in 1873.

Secretary Budge is not popular with his colleagues in the Cabinet, and of these republicans from Ohio, as now, and extremely popular with the majority of the people. They thought him the only man in the Cabinet to stand up for the people, and to the President's position with the soldier vote. He takes things very coolly and says he has nothing to regret, and further that he intends to see to it that no subordinate of his shall carry any of the provisions belonging properly to the Secretary of the Interior.

The navy department has decided to accept the gun boat "Petrel," and the contractors have been notified to deliver her at the Norfolk navy yard.

Considerable surprise has been created here by the announcement that ex-Representative Glaser, of Missouri had entered the Senatorial contest in that State in opposition to Senator Vest.

The government of Switzerland has voluntarily apologized for the imprisonment of an American citizen traveling in that country.

J. W. BROTON.

An Editor's Adventure.

From the New York Star.

"If one had another experience," the old editor continued, "but far from the same locality, between 2 and 3 o'clock of the morning, after I had got out from my night's work at the editorial desk, in a solitary and dimly lighted part of Franklin street, through which I was traveling, I became aware, unexpectedly, that some one stood in the shadow of an old building, I was suddenly confronted by three rough-looking characters, one of whom brought his face close up to mine, and said in a low voice: Got any money, mister? 'Money? I replied, while standing as cool as a cucumber, 'Money? Yes, I've got a pocketful' and I jugged some silver in the pocket of my trousers. How much do you want?" I asked. "Got a quarter, please," he gruffly said, as he stood beside his two pals. "A quarter, you fool?" I replied, "a quarter take a half dollar, and go away from me!" And you, I said to each of the two others, "here is a half for you and get away from me!" The men were intimidated, and the money, cried, "March!" for you? "Thank you," and disappeared along a side street. I suppose that, if I had not done as I did, I would have been knocked down and robbed, but, as it happened, I saved myself from that fate, and am waiting for other adventures after midnight."

The Problem of Education.

Mr. W. H. Murray, of Boston, once a preacher, and now a Holman, has been called many rough names, but nobody has ever called him a fool.

The other day Mr. Murray lectured in Boston on "The Problem of Education," and some of his views deserve to be considered by every thoughtful citizen.

Our present system of education, the lecturer thinks, falls short of what it should be. It is a great mistake to suppose that wisdom is to be found between the covers of a book and absorbed by the reader. It is not true education to stuff a child's mind with the contents of text books. Too much of what is taught in our schools educates the pupil away from a useful life.

The child is led to believe that useful lines of employment are beneath him, and that is more potent to be told than to be a toiler. Such a system of education is a mistaken system. It is not peculiar to the public schools alone; it runs through our entire educational system. What is needed is an education that will send every pupil into the world prepared and determined to do something useful.

Unfortunately Mr. Murray is on the right line, and the popularity of our industrial schools shows that the people are with him. In this practical age education is judged by its results. The system yielding a product of well equipped, industrious and successful men is the best.

What makes success? The Scientific American answers this question. It says: "Success is the result of studying to try, and one per cent of failure, will insure success in whatever we undertake."

Thanksgiving Proclamation.
The President has issued a proclamation appointing Thursday, November 29th, as a day of national thanksgiving. He says: "A high by favored people, mindful of their dependence on the bounty of Divine Providence, should seek fitting occasion to testify gratitude and ascribe praise to Him who is author of their many blessings. It behooves us, then, to look back with thankful hearts over the past year, and bless God for His infinite mercy in vouchsafing to our land during peace, to our people freedom from pestilence and famine, to our husbandmen abundant harvests and to them that labor a recompense of their toils."
He recommends that the day be set apart as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and that the people of our country, ceasing from the cares and labors of their working day, shall assemble in their respective places of worship and give thanks to God, who has prospered us on our way and made our path the path of peace; be something Him to bless the day to our present and future good making it truly one of thanksgiving for such benighted home as for the nation as large.

When the day is over, the people of the United States are to be reminded of the fact that the day is not a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and that the people of our country, ceasing from the cares and labors of their working day, shall assemble in their respective places of worship and give thanks to God, who has prospered us on our way and made our path the path of peace; be something Him to bless the day to our present and future good making it truly one of thanksgiving for such benighted home as for the nation as large.
